Title of Paper

The agent describes a person, place, thing, or concept that performs the action (the verb) of a sentence. Though this may be less exciting than well-dressed sentient programs, agents are an important part of how we communicate. We don't have to think consciously about agents, or even know what they are, in order to use them because language would be crippling if we had to know a mile of grammar for every inch of words we write or speak. Agents take ownership of verbs; for example, a sentence like "The neighbor's car was stolen" is vague because it lacks an agent and readers wonder "Who stole the car?" when you could simply provide the information that "My little brother stole the neighbor's car." An agent can drastically change the implications of a sentence.

Logic:	\sim
"the mechanic or a mechanic"
Grammar:	~
"every time"

Clarity: "threatened to lose control of their thoughts"

Agents are expressed most directly as the grammatical subject of a sentence. Agents, usually, should be positioned as the subject, or else we end up with something like this: "The neighbor's car was stolen by my little brother." Either version of the sentence works. It's a question of whether we want to draw more attention to the neighbor's car or the little brother.

All writing benefits from clearness, from being clear and direct. In quite a lot of cases, in fact, in most cases, it is very advantageous to deliberately position agents as the subjects of your sentences in order to quickly convey information to your readers. This isn't not a rule. We simply want to avoid writing sentences that prompt readers to ask, "Who is doing what? What's going on?" If our sentences do not describe action, our readers may lose interest in what we have to say. our readers may not immediatly understand our meaning due to our sentences obscuring who or what performs the action. Actually, difficult language and tangled sentences are the enemies of clarity.
